Oxygenation of red blood cells (RBC) was measured non-invasively with a continuous-flow Hemocontractometer in standard and low-density polyethylenglycol (PEG)-stabilized blood samples in order to obtain a normogram in different groups of critical patients. For the investigation of blood from human body the standard Hemocontractometer was used. For the stabilization of blood samples with PEG the Hemocontractometer allows a new diagnostic approach with low-density PEG blood samples. The measurement of RBC oxygenation in standard and low-density PEG blood samples correlated well in all investigated groups of critical patients. The development of the RBC P50 values in groups of critical patients with different diseases or with normal body function is presented. This method is applicable 82157476af
